You currently do not have any active plugins installed.Generally in an electronic camera, light from an object is focused by a lens onto a photo-sensitive film or an electronic sensor which is placed at the film's location. Each image on a frame of film is developed into a permanent print, and a video recording of the scene is stored electronically for future playback by a device such as a television system or the like. Images on film are typically stored digitally in an electronic memory on the camera in the form of pixels arranged in a raster pattern, with the pixel information being stored either in a frame buffer, a pixel buffer, or an external memory. The available memory is of a limited nature, and many applications require that information be stored in compressed form. It is also desirable to be able to record at least some scene information for visual orientation in order to aid a user in framing a picture. A number of techniques have been suggested for this, for example one which suggests using a film's serial number as a characteristic that is unique for a particular film, and by knowing this number, placing a film into a particular position with respect to the camera lens, to help the photographer to frame the scene. However, such an approach requires a facility to determine the film's serial number at the time of manufacture. Another suggestion is to record a time code or frame number onto a strip of film, which can later be read and decoded to determine the frame number. Again, such an approach requires knowledge of the strip information in order to decode the frame number, and also makes it necessary to use a marker to record the frame number on the film. Concepts have also been proposed to use electronic sensors in cameras to facilitate photography. For example, still picture cameras
