

The player movements and movements of the goalkeepers are created by motion capture equipment, and then linked together to build a visual representation of all the players in motion. This data is then used to power all the gameplay elements, such as passing, shooting, and defending.

“We set out to make FIFA 22 not only the best football video game, but also to create the most realistic and immersive experience of football,” said Walter Green, senior producer on FIFA. “Our goal was to make each player feel unique, and truly the only way to do this is to use real-life data from these actual players to drive the gameplay, in addition to the standard tools.” The introduction of HyperMotion Technology changes how FIFA 22 looks and plays, from the individual movements of the players and movements of the goalkeepers, to the emotions that are created during gameplay.

For example, the player movements are used to power the player animations of ball passes and shots, tackling, and dribbling. The animation when a player tackles another player is animated based on the force of the actual tackle. The momentum of a player is used to animate ball passes, shots, and other on-the-ball interactions. On-the-ball animations, such as a player dribbling past their defender, use the motion of the player’s actual movement. In addition, goalkeepers are able to feel the force of a shot on their goalkeeper, and also react to a ball in flight to react accordingly. When a goalkeeper is moving with the ball, they can see the exact player that will receive the ball and how they will react, all before the ball is even touched. These exact behaviors, which were a product of player data, allow them to react to the ball with more realism and reactions when collecting the ball, as well as when the player moves off the goal line into the field. “By using the data from actual players in this manner, we were able to make the gameplay a bit more realistic, allowing for the players to physically move and respond in a more natural way,” Green said. “We’re now able to move closer to being able to produce a movie or a documentary of a game based on how the real players move during the game. It’s a truly new and unique way of looking at sports and gaming.” For example, a player has to chase a ball from a second-
