I'm pretty happy about it. but I'm also a bit surprised, because it's a bit late for that. (And there is already a second part in development) I'm really curious about the server support for Crawling Silence. I tried it before when they added the same features to The Unrest. But it wasn't so good. It just wasn't working for me. But maybe it's going to be much better this time.

Features Key:

Is there somehow to look for the specific tag in my list-item? A: You are asking about two things here - your list items and the divs that you are trying to parse. In your HTML, the elements with the id="list" are actually inside divs with class="list". To handle this in an easier manner, you can use css to position your divs. For instance, add this to your css: .list { position:absolute; top:0; width:100%; } If you would like to just position your list items, then you need to position the list items and then position the div that is containing them inside the list, like so: #container { position:absolute; top:0; width:100%; }, .list { position:absolute; left:0; width:100%; } etc... You can also do this using javascript, but you will have to write some more code to locate the elements that you are looking for. After you have located your elements, you would have to move them to their desired positions using css or javascript.
