This time, the acquisition will actually finish with a design. The remote lock system is basically three small relays that connect the solenoid of the liftgate locking mechanism to the solenoid of the automatic door opener. In case of a failed lock, the opener will unlock the liftgate, opening it manually, which is convenient if one has to use the liftgate. A parasitic motor is used to trigger the other two relays. A microcontroller interprets the state of the relays and then decides whether to trigger the opener. Normally, the opener solenoid is activated only when the liftgate is closed. Only if the liftgate is open, the opener solenoid turns into an open collector, and the relay becomes active. When the liftgate is closed again, the collector goes into high impedance, the relay becomes inactive and the opener solenoid is deactivated. My first design was a hardware solution - a solenoid + a relay. I switched from the solenoid to a hall effect sensor because it is less sensitive to changes of temperature and humidity. With the sensor, I've only required two power transistors for the four contacts, and I've changed the I/O expander to an IC with a small chip. This time I've had an idea of microcontroller programming as well, and I chose the Arduino, which was also easy to use and has built-in USB interface. The sketch utilizes all the USB's I/O possibilities to control the relays. Five of them are needed to control the four relays and to check the status of the two solenoids: UART to PIC - to control the relays Rx - to check the power level of the unlock solenoid Cx - to check the power level of the lock solenoid Rx2 - to 0cc13bf012

`cell.setIconified(true); cell.setAttribute(Qt::WA_DeleteOnClose);`
At the moment I cannot find a way to implement such thing with QTableView itself. The only way I could find is to create a custom QTableView using the QAbstractTableModel. I also found a question on SO, that may help, however it only mentions QTableView, and I have no idea how to apply it to my case. A: If you have a custom model that supports this, you can do `this model = new YourCustomModel(this); qTableView = new QTableView(); qTableView->setModel(model);` Now the model may not support multiple views, so you have to override the `focusEvent()` to get the iconified state. Other models may not support multiple views either, and you will have to do something like this: `QAbstractItemDelegate::setItemWidget(QTableView::CellWidget, cellWidget);` Where `cellWidget` is the view to be shown in the cell Ok this sounds to great to be true, are there any stats to prove this out. If so, now or in the past, I'm getting a good deal on my truck. Thanks With us on our
