Behavioral heterogeneity of untreated juvenile idiopathic arthritis synovitis. Un-manipulated, clinical synovitis associated with juvenile idiopathic arthritis (JIA) is characterized by nonspecific symptoms, but it can also manifest as pain, fatigue, and inflammation. This study investigated the nature of pain, fatigue, and inflammation in both arthritic and nonarthritic JIA and identified patients with JIA-associated pain and fatigue, with this pain treated effectively, and those with untreated pain and fatigue (i.e., JIA-pain and JIA-fatigue) that could be addressed with pharmacological therapy. Among the 79 JIA patients (0-17 years) enrolled in the JIA Natural History Study (NHS), 68 were evaluated for JIA-pain and fatigue. The Acute Pain Service evaluated 15 patients with JIA-pain and fatigue (all had physician-reported arthritis present), and 3 patients with JIA-pain and fatigue were evaluated at the JIA-pain clinic. The Pediatric Pain Quality of Life Measure was completed by 48 patients (0-14 years) with JIA-pain and fatigue. JIA-pain and JIA-fatigue were associated with a more diffuse pattern of pain, fatigue, and functional impairment than nonspecific JIA. Patients with JIA-pain and JIA-fatigue had depression scores within the average range for JIA, were generally functionally impaired, and reported similar sleep quality and coping. Patients evaluated at the JIA-pain clinic reported that clinical, rather than behavioral and/or pharmacological measures were effective in relieving pain, fatigue, and other symptoms. These data demonstrate behavioral heterogeneity in both JIA-pain and JIA-fatigue and suggest that the phenotypic expression of these symptoms is similar to nonspecific JIA. Behavioral and pharmacological strategies are used to manage JIA-pain and JIA-fatigue.

We teach people the gospel, so they have the freedom to accept or reject it (see Moro, 5; 1 Nephi 13:33-34). Even in this time, when many are taking the gospel away from those who ask for it, there are those like those you will read about in Elder R. Palmer's next letters, and our new prophet, "who have returned to our Father in Heaven, so that they might find a true home." The gospel in these times needs to be taught and practiced. If we don't teach the gospel to the people we meet, they don't have it and they don't need it. * We can also give spiritual advice to those who are in the position that we were in when we were first teaching people the gospel.
