I understand that pipe(2) has a number of file descriptors and they are in use (as with pipe(), fcntl(2) and bind(2) have file descriptor numbers): Pipes are an abstraction which makes it possible to simulate a sequence of file descriptor. (...) Let's assume I have a couple of named pipes with no file descriptors (as created by mkfifo(2), for example) - how can I open one using the pipe() syscall? A: The syscall pipe(2) only works with file descriptors on the command line; it will not create a pipe with no descriptors. The manual page provides an example of the usage using descriptors. In the burgeoning area of non-lethal weapons, possibly one of the biggest unknowns is how long the energy in a laser will remain stored in a small device. While a typical laser will require electricity to be constantly pumped into it to maintain a light source, a quantum laser requires no power to keep it lit. Instead, it keeps a continuously circulating cloud of atoms or molecules, referred to as a Bose-Einstein condensate (BEC), in a coherent superposition. A challenge that has plagued science fiction for years is how long a coherent superposition could remain after a quantum laser is powered off. A team of researchers at the University of Maryland – College Park has published a new paper outlining a way to keep a quantum laser's energy stored in a condensate for up to 60 billion years. The team first developed the laser technology in 2009 and a version of the laser that they worked with was powered off in August this year.
